

ABSTRACT

A gas-assisted internal combustion engine has been invented which is capable of using energy stored in high pressure primary and reserve reservoirs in the form of compressed gas during normal operation and calling on that energy to provide additional power during start-up, acceleration and high demand requirements.